Right off the bat, you can take a moment and ponder the pros and cons of Lightroom. You'll have to weigh them against the vast collection of photo editing software that is available today -- say goodbye to $50,000 worth of equipment bought at an expensive price that you might never use. You may also be able to use some of these tools, since Adobe has released a Linux version as well as versions for Apple's Macs. If you are happy with your current software, there's no need to rush out and buy Lightroom 5, but if you were curious about what may be on the horizon it might be an excellent idea to jump in. To use Lightroom 5, you'll need a computer running Windows 7, 8 or 10 -- sorry, no support for 32-bit Windows or any of the older counterparts, not even Windows 7. In addition, a copy of the Adobe Creative Cloud is required. The app uses battery a lot. It does not do anything important. I load a file from the camera, then I update there using other tools. The app runs after every loading. For example, I had a photo I had updated in the browser, later in the evening, refreshed here, and it had the new version. I did not open the app as it was the same version than before so I did not have revisions I actually needed to see. The app eats battery even if it refreshes no changes. The app looks worse than other apps. One time it did not work and a life I passed a dark room came to me, otherwise I did not know why it did not work. It does not respond well to the external display as it takes a lot of battery to refresh. The file browser is awkward and it is not cleaned well when you finish. It is hard to believe that Apples Photos app has more features. Features better than Photoshop, and that is why you have it?
