One of the most frustrating things about living with a chronic disease like fibromyalgia is the lack of understanding and the endless debate of what causes the symptoms. It is impossible to know what will help and what will not help, so there is no direct link between cause and effect. Sometimes, one or two causes are the most likely culprits. The symptoms can get worse after taking certain medications or while you are in particular situations that trigger your symptoms. A condition called fibromyalgia is diagnosed when one has chronic widespread muscle pain, and when it is present, there is often stiffness and fatigue. The diagnosis is not made when one feels the symptoms, but when the patient presents with all four criteria: Pain that is widespread, which is the involvement of three or more body areas, and for more than three months Stiffness Tiredness Widespread pain Symptoms usually appear to be more severe in the mornings or in the evenings, and may go away with physical activity. Fibromyalgia is thought to affect 1-3 percent of the U.S. population. Fibromyalgia is not a disease per se. Doctors still don’t really understand what causes it, but they do believe that the pain and fatigue can be related to problems in the brain and the nervous system, not the muscles. That’s the reason it is called a syndrome and not a disease. Symptoms can be controlled with treatment. Medication like tricyclic antidepressants and the benzodiazepines can be helpful. Unfortunately, research has shown that these drugs either don’t work or have side effects. Exercise is very important, and cognitive-behavioral therapy (CBT) or other mind-body techniques can work too. Research has revealed that the inflammatory process in the brain may be very active in fibromyalgia. Some believe that the source of the inflammation may be changes in gene expression. Treatments and Drugs Exercise is often an important treatment, and can help decrease the pain and fatigue. An important mind-body treatment is deep meditation, where the patient focuses on his or her breathing in an effort to calm down and relax. Other techniques include guided relaxation, which involves the person listening to soothing sounds like ocean waves or the nighttime sounds of crickets. Other therapies include CBT or other exercises designed to improve the person’s ability to cope with stress. Relaxation

Q: how to change content or label in a fieldset for a computed field I'm creating a form using Visualforce. I have a fieldset set as required and I have two fields to be populated in it: As you can see, I've set the required="false" and also set the value of the input fields to the value of MyFields. I need to change the label/value of these input fields based on the value of the sObject.IsDefault. I've tried changing the label value of the input fields as follows. The label value is correct when I have a value in MyFields that matches the value of sObject.IsDefault. However, when there is no value in the field, then the label is still displayed. How can I get this to work? A: You can create multiple versions of the same page block on your VF page, and then choose what one to use based on the value of the sObject.IsDefault field. The
