According to the Economic and Monetary Affairs Commissioner Olli Rehn, "the European Commission will decide whether to keep the ban on the acceptance of payment for goods and services in virtual currency, or to lift the ban, following a hearing in April 2015". Claudio Caldro, president of the Bitcoin Association Italy, explained that "The Italian bitcoin community thinks the ban on acceptance of payment for goods and services in virtual currency should be maintained. The Italian bitcoin community believes that the EC must do a large-scale study on the impact of cryptocurrencies on retail prices and monetary policy". Gabriele Ongaro, CEO of Banco di Napoli in Italy, noted that "the complete ban on acceptance of payment for goods and services in virtual currencies can be the wrong decision" and that "the bitcoin community in Italy is formed by professionals who could bring a lot of advantages to the Italian economy. Some businesses have also successfully accepted bitcoin in Italy". Carlo Gellè, president of the Bitcoin Association Italian, underlined that "Italian bitcoin community members are entrepreneurs who 'walk the talk' and we are ready to face the challenges created by the hearing of the EC" and that "the Bitcoin Association Italian has been involved with the Italian bitcoin community for a long time and our membership is growing fast". Craigslist is one of the most popular services used today by city dwellers to avoid the hassle of trying to get a table at a restaurant or find an available seat on public transit. But what might the online classified ads company do with the data it collects? A researcher from Carnegie Mellon University is examining what happens to an individual's data once it is collected. Joshua Dominiq is with the Carnegie Mellon Information Networking Institute, where he is developing a system dubbed CloudFox that would allow users to protect their data while utilizing the service. Dominiq isn't only concerned with protecting the privacy of his research subjects, he is also interested in building a system that would allow users to get a sense of what data collection is happening and how that data is being used. He told Stephen Cole, host of CBC's On the Coast, that the key in the art of hacking is to find flaws in the system. He added that over the last 10 years he and his collaborators have hacked dozens of networked services, including monitoring traffic on the University of Virginia's network. "In our case, we've already built and have research published on an attack against Craigslist and are now conducting similar research into a service like Craigslist," said Dominiq. "The concept that we are really looking to attack is the notion that it's just one layer removed from the user." In the real world, he said, researchers can watch traffic flow over the network to detect when people are trying to hack in, but that's not something he wants to do with the CloudFox system. "From a privacy standpoint, it's just not possible to do this with current monitoring or detection technology," said Dominiq. "You can detect those attacks [on the networks] but you can't really see what those attacks are trying to accomplish." Dominiq said there are other ways to get an idea of what is happening, but that getting the data is the key. "One of the things we have been doing is capturing traffic and then using various methods to de-anonymize traffic," he said. "We've been able to get other people to publish on attacks on Craigslist or similar services." The method they used to de-anonymize their traffic was by using DNS poisoning. DNS stands for "domain name server," which is the server that translates the domain name www.craigslist.org
