970-385-3191. Metabolism of adenosine to inosine in the human retinal pigment epithelium. Inosine, a product of purine metabolism, is known to be taken up by cells through equilibrative and concentrative transporters. However, the role of inosine has not been clarified. To investigate the role of inosine in retinal pigment epithelium (RPE), we measured the metabolism of [(3)H]-adenosine to [(3)H]inosine in cultured human RPE cells. The conversion from [(3)H]-adenosine to [(3)H] inosine occurred at a low rate (0.18 nmol/mg protein/h) that was not significantly different from the background value of this process in the culture medium or medium with an unsupplemented and ATP-free system. The conversion from [(3)H]-adenosine to [(3)H] inosine was inhibited by 0.1 mM concentration of N(6)-phenylisopropyladenosine (PIA), a P2-purinoceptor blocker, but neither 0.1 mM concentration of 8-phenyltheophylline (8-PT), a P1-purinoceptor blocker nor 1 mM concentration of adenosine deaminase did. 0.1 mM concentration of PIA significantly inhibited the conversion rate from [(3)H]-adenosine to [(3)H]-inosine in the medium with 1.0 mM concentration of ATP but not that in the medium without ATP. These results suggested that RPE cells take up adenosine through the equilibrative and concentrative transporters and convert the adenine nucleoside to inosine in the presence of ATP.
