What's new in Atomic Cyclecar Racing:

and Electric Vehicle Technology Across the Globe If the promise of electric vehicles really is to one day be the energy source for every vehicle on the road, they will have to compete with the compact, boxy, gas-powered cars of today for the hearts and minds of consumers. To make itself relevant in a selling environment where almost 60 percent of new cars sold in America are hybrids and fully electric sedans are all but extinct, Atomic had to make its entry wide and deep, and very loud. Which is why it was fitting that its first ever car, made in conjunction with the all-new Toyota eQ, The Godzilla of Lights, premiered last night under the glare of the Vancouver Sun & Province's new hydrogen-powered hydrogen street light, the car was a mixture of noise and music, and in the car, there was seemingly nothing but music. The music is more than a way to make a statement. In some ways it's also the redux of the Ultra Low Emission Vehicle program, or ULEV, that launched 2 years ago, but which has been condemned as a government failure by environmentalists. It's an appeal to the average punter to try and get him to get out of his car, because otherwise, we're going to need to meet you halfway on the eco-front. Through sound, the eight-seater cars are able to go faster, they say, and to get more people in and out of those cars as quickly as possible. The point can be argued by the music as much as anything. And in the end, it offers the promise of versatility. Which is what draws electric vehicles into the future. One of the things that Atomic has been trying to change is the perception that electric vehicles are slow (they're not). With a range of 400 kilometres, the eQ drives itself and can be charged up overnight in the garage. The network of residential charging stations would supposedly be available coast to coast by 2010. The Godzilla of Lights was turning people away for the show, but then what can you expect given that the proprietors also had the vehicle with them? There's something startling about stepping into an electric vehicle. Especially when it's running over 10 thousand watts at high volume. Manic, even. Twenty-five beats a second and more than 108 decibels sound, the equivalent of a white noise generator in the most noise-sensitive inner cities across the country. And
