Collaborative working between health, safety and community services aims to prevent accidents and injury whilst encouraging work and play. However, it is unclear how these initiatives fit within employment law or work place health promotion (H&S) policies. The aim of this study was to explore the views and experiences of an innovative health and safety audit scheme, developed to promote musculoskeletal health and safety among building maintenance staff working in the UK. The barriers to implementing programmes addressing musculoskeletal injury and musculoskeletal health are well recognised. The health and safety audit scheme, developed for the building maintenance sector, is one approach to addressing the barriers. The scheme was piloted among 22 UK-based building maintenance workers; a mixed-methods study was undertaken to explore the views and experiences of the scheme. In order to build a relevant and interesting programme for local government and health service organisations, it is essential to explore the views and experiences of potential participants. An innovative health and safety audit scheme has been implemented to promote musculoskeletal health and safety for building maintenance staff and an evaluation has been carried out. Biblia para las amaricas. Biblia de las Amores. Die Seeker-Verlagskette Dr. Georg Delbrueck, Berlin. Die Seeker-Verlagskette Dr. Karl Richter,.The present invention relates to the field of gene expression. More specifically, the present invention provides methods and compositions for targeting gene expression to cells having a certain genetic background. Rationales for targeting gene expression to cells are manifold. For example, genes whose expression is deleterious for a cell may be inactivated specifically in the cells of the animal to which gene expression is targeted. Alternatively, genes with beneficial effect on animals may be targeted specifically to cells within the animal where the genes are deleterious to the animal. A final example is the development of gene therapy for the treatment of genetic diseases. In this context, gene expression in the proper cells might be targeted to elicit a beneficial response, for example, an immune response. A gene may be inactivated by a variety of strategies, including, for example, the use of antisense sequences (U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,581,783; 4,743,559; and 5,019,646), restriction sites (U.S. Pat.

Nos. 5,215,965; 5,175,275; and 5,735,767), ribozymes (U.S. Pat. No. 5,107,065), and directed inactivation by site-specific recombination (U.S. Pat. No. 5,654,318). The prior art teaches that the achievement of a site-specific effect often requires a significant degree of knowledge of the underlying biological mechanisms involved. For example, ribozyme design is both empirical and dependent on a model of how the ribozyme cleaves the target RNA. Likewise, antisense sequences are often designed to base pair to the target mRNA and may be specific for the mRNA, but base pairing alone will not be an adequate marker of specificity, since the antisense may also bind to mRNA from unrelated sources. Moreover, a target cell may be altered by a change in its genome, and this change in the genome will affect the subsequent behavior of the cell. Thus, the ability to target a given cell is predicated on an understanding of the mechanisms that control the specificity of the target cell. Antisense therapy is a form of targeted gene therapy which utilizes specific, i.e., antisense e79caf774b
