Tom Didinich, a former award-winning columnist with National Public Radio's Morning Edition in Portland, Ore., believes a syllabus doesn't exist in creative writing, and teaches "the tools of the trade" of writing, not "the how-tos of writing." He is the author of the ebook Don't Shoot the Writer. Writing (including book publishing) requires a series of steps, but it is best to have a course guide to smooth the way. It will help you get started, and get most of the deadlines met. 1. Get the material ready You can teach the basics before you teach the details, but without basic material in place, you won't have time or inclination to teach the details. Reach out to your faculty adviser or to a writing center to find out who has books and/or materials and ask them if they have any suggestions for your first class. Even on the most basic level, you'll need a desk, a chair, and a pencil. You might even want a whiteboard or chalkboard. The material should include general information on writing--what to avoid, how to format a page, what to consider when choosing your word processor. You don't need to learn every program. It's probably best to get the basic material from the instructor who will be teaching your class, since he or she can lead you through the process. If you are using a textbook to teach your class, you might want to look for material that hasn't yet been incorporated into your textbook. You may also want to find an online tutorial for your class. Click here to find out how. There are also many teachers who are willing to help first-time writers who have no textbook and
