I've been told that it's not good programming practice to have a C++ API. I'm under the impression that this is because of the static nature of the language. Can I use C/C++ as an API when I'm trying to build a library for another language? For example, I have my private API for a C++ library. But I want to use the C API to communicate with the private C++ API. A: In my opinion, you can't do it in a good way. The reason for this is that your API will be seen as something that is just a convenience wrapper around the C++ class, not as a C interface to a C++ library. You'll loose some of the benefits of the C++ library. IMHO, it's better to have a C API and a C++ API that both talk to a C++ class. You can then link the C++ class to the C API, and the C API to a C++ library. A: Your life will be a little easier if you use something like a "bridge" between the library and the C/C++ application. Here's a toy example of using Boost.Python to give you a simple way to call/use a library from C++. Within your C++ application, you would have a class that represents the objects that your library deals with. You'd want to use this as a normal C++ class in the library. Then you would use Boost.Python to create a Python class that would represent these objects. This Python class would have methods that expose the same data and functions as the library C++ classes, but in a way that is useable in
