methotrexate in the rat. Methotrexate (MTX) is widely used to treat patients with rheumatoid arthritis, acute myelocytic leukemia, osteoporosis, osteosarcoma and several lymphomas. The high dose (HD) MTX regimen consists of high doses of MTX and E-containing polyamine compounds such as EDTA (ethylenediaminetetraacetic acid) or DTPA (diethylenetriaminepentaacetic acid). A rapid polyamine release from target cells after administration of HD-MTX led us to investigate the effect of a new monoclonal antibody,

A: This might be a bit old, but Google has the best search results for this question. Try this filetype:dii to dats Q: Would having no less than  $n$  numbers suffice for proof-writing? I've been wondering whether a paper can be full of equations without proof or statement of lemmas without showing them. Is there a reason to this? For example, I recently worked on a proof which turned out to be a long proof (without doubt, it's long) so I was just about to jump to statement of lemmas. But, since this proof was long, I was curious whether I could have just one statement of a lemma in a paper and actually there could be many lemmas that I haven't proven yet. It is just to save some time and paper. I'd like to understand why this is not acceptable. Is there any logical reason for this? A: While it is certainly possible, as the other answers have indicated, it is not the standard way to do proofs. But I will explain how it could be done, in the hope
