Nucleic acid aptamer-nanoparticle assay for hepatitis B virus (HBV) and its application in dual affinity separation. In this study, Hepatitis B virus (HBV)-specific DNA aptamer was developed and applied in a novel dual affinity separation system. The binding assay for DNA aptamer was established by using FITC-labeled oligonucleotide aptamer and its specific cellular marker. The assay for the target antigen of HBV, which was carried on the surface of HBV capsid, was developed by the use of the specific anti-HBV monoclonal antibody. The target antigen concentration was determined by the aptamer-nanoparticle assay, and the results were further confirmed by the competitive assay of the target antigen and the monoclonal antibody. The assay results indicate that the developed method has a broad range of linearity and accuracy for the determination of the target antigen concentration of HBV. The assay was applied to cell-free and cell-associated HBV sample, and the results are comparable with that obtained using ELISA method.
