My (limited) understanding is that once a zero-day is discovered, the vendor most often holds off fixing or patching to the well-known vulnerabilities. The exploit/zero-day typically becomes "public domain" after a certain period of time, like 2-3 months, but is still zero days until the well-known vulnerabilities are patched? ~~~ drenvuk The well known vulnerabilities are the 'non-zero day'. There's still a period of time before they are patched. ~~~ asdfologist You don't make it sound like they are working together. ------ dylanjermiah This site generates warnings about flash content: [If you're receiving a warning, you may be using an older browser. Growing interest in the economic benefits of fish farming, and regulations such as strict nitrogen limits, has brought a need for improved methods of fish nutrition. Higher production efficiency and growth rates are controlled through nutrition. As one of the most important compounds of the glycan, N-glycan carbohydrates can be a target in the search for optimal feeding strategies. To address this, the impact of commercially available enzymes that modify N-linked glycans was studied under mass-farmed condition of fathead minnows (Pimephales promelas). Results suggest enzymes that adjust the terminal linkage and the core structure to be the appropriate targets. Enzymes with the potential to improve growth were GalTII, modifying GalNAc3-4β-GlcNAc3, and GalTIII, modifying GalNAc3-4β6GalTII inhibited growth, and the galactosylation of core 1 and 4 decreased at 16% of total protein. Growth inhibition suggests that the enzymes were of the trade-off strategy. The use of these enzymes may not be risk-free; therefore a benefit analysis is needed.Share this: Like this: Ginger

Q: Using Cognito and not DynamoDB on API Gateway with Fargate I'm using Cognito, which is Fargate-managed, for user authentication, and another region-managed AWS service for storing user data. The two services are all hosted under the same stack/account, i.e. by using Fargate, but each service is uniquely named. I'd like to separate the two services from each other, but I'm running into problems trying to do so with the "Cognito User Pool" and the "DynamoDB Database." Is there any way I can achieve this separation by utilizing Fargate? A: There's no way to do that in aws, as far as I'm aware (because of the way lambdas and cognito work in fargate). You're probably best off just logging into one console and then doing everything else in the other.
