Featured Research Big oil companies run background checks, online dating service checks, but NRA doesn't Date: January 26, 2014 Source: Stanford University School of Medicine Summary: The National Rifle Association is perhaps the most scrutinized organization in the United States. Its members are looked at by the media, its donors scrutinized, it receives criticism for political endorsements, and its leadership is scrutinized. But the NRA's army of gun safety advocates is perhaps more active than that of any other organization. Share This Image Source: Stanford University School of Medicine. However, according to a study by Stanford School of Medicine researchers and collaborators, the NRA is a remarkably closed organization whose leadership conducts little in the way of external vetting. Researchers analyzed the membership, finances, and leadership of the NRA and found

The National Rifle Association is perhaps the most scrutinized organization in the United States. Its members are looked at by the media, its donors scrutinized, it receives criticism for political endorsements, and its leadership is scrutinized. But the NRA's army of gun safety advocates is perhaps more active than that of any other organization. The Stanford researchers, led by Matthew Miller, MD, PhD, and Kjersten Mitchell, PhD, compared the NRA's membership and finances to the Census Bureau's Bureau of Labor Statistics. In 2012, the NRA had about 4.3 million members and 98,000 officers, according to statistics from the National Shooting Sports Foundation. That's slightly fewer members than the unions for American's Teamsters and railroad workers. The number of members, however, represents only one part of the NRA's mission. Unlike groups like the American Medical Association and American Cancer Society, which 6d1f23a050
