If you've been following along with our regular gameplay updates, you may have already noticed that the game has a lot in common with soccer. Players run, pass, dribble, shoot and intercept as they head towards the opposing goal, trying to score more often than their opponents. These simple, beautiful moves extend into everything we do with EA SPORTS FIFA. In soccer, it's possible for an attacking player to run the entire length of the field to score. In FIFA, it's possible to run the entire length of the field and still be one of the last players to get a shot off. The game starts with over 600 unique player animations, and this number is constantly growing. Every player moves differently, while some move without dribbling or cutting in. Players launch shots with their individual touch types, while others kick long distance set pieces with their shin. You can see it in the way players work together on the pitch, or the way they react to one another's defensive actions. Each team's tactics emerge from their strengths and weaknesses. In FIFA, we've added 28 new badges – and confirmed that the number of badges is now at 400 - to further distinguish the styles of play of each team. Another way in which we've taken our approach to FIFA is with the introduction of our first ever dynamic camera. This dynamic camera will guide players around the field to make sure that every shot or pass, long or short, is positioned at the right place, so the player can shoot or receive the ball with maximum effect. In FIFA, every shot and pass matters. We expect the on-pitch action in FIFA to be as important to players as it is on the pitch in real life. We're doing all we can to make this happen. Our focus is to create the most authentic football gameplay in a soccer simulation and we're not stopping until that goal is achieved. We wanted to ensure we put all of our passion and investment into every aspect of FIFA. We're using motion capture to ensure that every player moves fluidly, everything on the field looks and sounds the same as in the real game and at the same time, you can count on FIFA to provide truly unpredictable gameplay with the introduction of Fouls and Free Kicks. We are focusing on building a game that will set the standard for FIFA. We are introducing something new in every session of gameplay to keep you coming back to the game. We're making sure that the game experience is as authentic as possible, so you
