“We have a very high-precision engine and physics system,” said Alex Magath, FIFA 22 game director, at EA SPORTS™ FIFA World Cup™ Moscow™. “We use a large amount of data to drive a high degree of physics that can be used to capture the complexity of real football matches. We are using technology that has never been used before in real time.” Simulated, true-to-life reaction of players and boots on ball is achieved, as a result of a player’s movement with contextual animations, so that players look and react as real players do in the moment of receiving the ball. The player’s muscles are fully simulated in the movement of their arms, legs and body, replicating the forces of movement that players actually experience. For example, players will pull up their socks as they move, kick the ball in the air and spin while still in full stride, then more accurately land with a kick. The kicks, throw-ins and free kicks are even more accurate. FIFA players move more fluidly, yet look like they are running at full pace during gameplay. They will also use more refined ball-dribbling animations and feint back-heels to get past the defence. The inclusion of a brand-new dribbling mechanic means players can subtly move to one side before switching direction and ball with greater control. Players can also exhibit more nuanced dribbling in open spaces because of the smarter Dribbling Control mechanic.

According to Santiago Solari, trainer of Argentina who led the squad to the country's first FIFA World Cup™ title last year, players can now read and anticipate the play, read opponents' movements and use the ball intelligently. "We are achieving high-intensity animations, but with the comfortable movement of players, they are able to do more tactical things,” said Solari. “That is what we were missing with previous versions of the game.” The ability to modify key parameters of the game also helps players unlock the nuances of the sport by refining the way they play. For example, in the FIFA 10 Ultimate Experience, players can adjust the speed of the game and sprint to make the challenge even more realistic. FIFA 22 also introduces Dribbling Mechanics, to make passing more rewarding and lead players into deeper areas of the pitch while playing with intelligent teammates. FIFA
