Adrenal function was assessed in 23 patients with pituitary macroadenomas before, during and after surgical intervention. Cortisol release was evaluated by measuring urinary cortisol output during an oral dexamethasone test (0.5 mg) and by measuring plasma ACTH and cortisol levels before, during and after surgery. After transsphenoidal and/or transthemoidal surgery the basal levels of plasma cortisol were reduced to normal values in 16 patients (70%) and transiently reduced values in 7 patients (30%). After endocrinological evaluation, 18 patients were treated by surgery alone (8 by transsphenoidal and 10 by transthemoidal surgery). After surgery a significant increase in the urinary cortisol excretion (0.5 to 8.6 mg/24 h) was observed on the first day after surgery and continued for about 2 weeks. In patients treated by surgery alone the urinary excretion of cortisol rose from 0.28 mg/24 h before surgery to values ranging from 0.8 mg/24 h on the first day and 1.2 mg/24 h on the second day after surgery. Plasma ACTH levels were reduced to normal values during surgery, but not significantly different from the preoperative values after surgery. Our data indicate that a great proportion of pituitary macroadenomas can be removed by the transsphenoidal or transthemoidal approach. A significant decrease in the urinary excretion of cortisol is observed both during and after surgery, but this does not alter the plasma concentration of this hormone.WWE Hall of Famer and UFC superstar Bas Rutten recently
