Pearl Harbor was the site of the surprise attack by Japan on the United States at 7:55AM on December 7, 1941, a date now marked every year as Pearl Harbor Day. The primary means of delivering this attack was by air using carrier-based aircraft and bombers. More than 200 years after this attack, many in Japan have a distorted view of the nature of the US-Japan alliance, both during World War II and since. For the American view, see the video at: A central objective of the strike was the U.S. fleet anchored in Pearl Harbor. Assigned the mission of stopping the U.S. Pacific fleet from being able to aid any Allied forces then engaged in the European war, Imperial Japanese forces attacked Pearl Harbor, a major U.S. naval base in Hawaii. The unexpected attack had several unexpected effects, particularly the commissioning of the U.S. into the war, as well as leading to U.S. entry into the war. The Japanese carriers had been sent on their attack without air cover for fear of detection. Many Japanese aviators were inexperienced at attacking on their own and maintained radio contact with the carriers. However, they needed air support to navigate and find the target. This communication problem may have led to the surprise of the attack. For complete information, see Pearl Harbor Encyclopædia.

What's new in Fire And Maneuver:

(10 July 1963) The next day, Brilliant Dawn, the world's first nuclear-powered super yacht, weighed anchor in the Greek harbor of Korinthos, northeast of Piraeus. Its passengers, often known as the most influential and successful personalities of the Western world, comprised the occupants of the USS Narwhal, one of U.S. Strategic Air Command's atomic-powered attack submarines. Capt. William S. Delchamps, commanding officer of the Narwhal, assembled his crew on the fantail to offer a toast to his ship's young, toasted navigator, First Lieutenant John C. Waddell, USN, who was celebrating his twenty-fifth birthday the night before. In place of a birthday cake, the officers and enlisted men of the Narwhal collected money for a birthday cake and other small tokens of Waddell's age and accomplishments. There they were when the young navigator stepped onto the deck of the yacht in order to hold the reception with his grateful shipmates. Waddell, a big, tough-looking young man of twenty-six, stood easily two heads taller than Delchamps and his other officers. And he had a light weather eye as well as a dark-brown life-altering pair of Irish eyes to go with them. Very handsome, with a quick-to-dark complexion, flawless features, and a deep voice to match, Waddell had active eyebrows that became animated with the least provocation. He spoke with quick precision and fluency, looked people straight in the eye, affected a "soldier's stiff-upper lip," and'd make them laugh with a puzzled look on his face. Delchamps and Waddell shared a room on the yacht. Waddell had been assigned the ensign lieutenant's billet. His shipmate earned his second lieutenant's stripes in October

1961, when he navigated the Narwhal more than 20,000 miles to Pearl Harbor in a record twenty-two days. Waddell's arrest in September 1962 for marijuana possession (he'd long since been rehabilitated and released) had ruined his year as commanding officer. Waddell was gregarious and wry, and he made friends easily. There was a hard edge to a certain sense of fairness in him that stood behind his obvious affinity for his shipmate. Delchamps liked Waddell's unflinching demeanor and black sense of humor. The Navy's young officer was eager to
