FScene for FSX and FS2004 is a high-quality flight simulator dedicated to the aircraft and scenery of Lockheed Martin, Honeywell, Saab, Boeing, and others. fscene4x FULL Version downloadNanoScale® Rocky Mountain Laboratories' NanoScale® Department of Technology Development provides services and uses nano-scale tools to support research across the electrical, mechanical, and materials science disciplines. We also develop nano-scale science educational outreach activities as a member of the National Science Foundation's (NSF) National Nanotechnology Coordinated Infrastructure (NNCI) and the NSF's Materials Research Science Education for America (MRSEC) programs. Our staff of over twenty professionals is organized around researchers whose principal focus is on processing, characterization, and analysis of nanometer-scale materials. Current research projects focus on the development of nano-enabled materials for high-speed electronics, ultra-high-strength thermoelectric materials, and electronic energy conversion. The department maintains a robust inventory of instruments, materials, process facilities, and procedures, as well as a program of training and research support services that are tailored to the needs of our faculty and researchers. We also support research that uses nano-scale materials and devices in infrastructure and device fabrication for nanotechnology and electronic devices. The following is a list of existing services and some of the activities conducted within the department: We work closely with researchers across the university to find the right instrument to fit their research needs and provide training to establish and maintain high standards of technical proficiency. Nano-Electro-Mechanical Fabrication Services We can design and fabricate devices for research and educational purposes, from micro- to nano-scale technologies. We focus on providing the smallest and highest quality components in order to facilitate experiments and research. Materials Characterization We provide characterization of nano-scale materials including: AFM, contact and tapping mode (high resolution, high force), scanning tunneling (STM), and electrochemical nano-voltammetry. Nanoscale Materials Preparation We provide nano-scale material preparation and processing including: We work with researchers in establishing laboratory conditions, processes, and equipment needed for safe, efficient, and reproducible research. We work with other facility support personnel to set up activities and processes and provide analysis of experimental results. Nano-Electro-Mechanical Research Infrastructure The 3e33713323
