Field of the Invention This invention relates to semiconductor devices and processes, and more particularly to copper interconnects formed on a substrate. 2. Description of Related Art Semiconductor device geometries have dramatically decreased in size since their introduction several decades ago. Today's fabrication processes are producing devices having channel lengths as short as 0.25 microns, and DRAM cells having storage capacitors as small as 0.4 microns. In the future, even smaller devices can be expected. The dramatic decrease in device geometries has resulted in the fabrication of storage capacitors having a high storage capacitance per unit area. One technique used to achieve the high capacitance is to increase the surface area of the capacitor electrodes by employing stacked capacitor structures. One common type of stacked capacitor is the so-called fin-type stacked capacitor in which fins of polysilicon are used as the lower electrode and are over-etched to increase the surface area. Since stacked capacitors are designed to maximize the surface area within the
