The group has been an associate of Monsanto. While providing a platform for controversial climate sceptics, the NIWA also has a mixed record. For example, NIWA was recently challenged in court over its claim that 2006 was the hottest year on record. In 2010, after the WMO appealed to the UN to stop NIWA from raising public awareness of climate change, the New Zealand Herald described the NIWA as “one of only a handful of research units left with the ability to monitor and predict global warming”. The NIWA was not alone in finding funding from the tobacco industry to be a potential conflict of interest. Campaigners have tried to fund an inquiry into the
