(Âle fenêtre est une Âfenêtre).The overall goal of this Program Project is to characterize the mechanisms by which certain bacterium disrupt epithelial barrier function and to develop novel therapies to treat disease states with compromised barrier function. To address this important and highly relevant problem, we assembled a highly collaborative and multidisciplinary team composed of personnel who have extensive experience in studying the functions of epithelial junctions and regulation of epithelial barrier function. The highly integrated nature of this team means that all Projects are closely related to one another, since they are driven by similar experimental observations. In addition, all Projects are connected to the common Cores. For example, the Cores for the Projects are perfectly suited to provide technical support to each Project, perform peptide synthesis, provide advice on peptide design and the biological activity of peptides, perform immuno-histochemistry, provide technical support in designing transgenic and knockout mice, and/or prepare tissues for immuno-histochemistry and/or electron microscopy. As a group, the questions we seek to address are of great relevance to human health. To begin, we have found that zymogen granule secretion from the pancreatic acinar cell is regulated by the cell adhesion molecule E-cadherin, and that the contact between acinar cells is mediated via a mechanism that requires E-cadherin. We have found that the cell polarity and barrier function of the intestinal epithelium is mediated by the cell adhesion molecule nectin-1, and that a heparin-binding protein (heparin-binding EGF-like growth factor or HB-EGF) on intestinal epithelial cells is functionally linked to nectin-1. In addition, we have found that a zonula occ 1cdb36666d
