CAD systems are used in product design and development. CAD applications are available to make a user's design of a product more efficient by automating certain aspects of the design process. For example, CAD applications can automatically generate and verify geometric shapes for the user to see and/or modify. With a CAD application, a user may drag a desired part from a CAD module in a visual workspace to create an assembly. The user also may drag the assembly to another CAD module, and repeat the process to create other assemblies in the visual workspace. The CAD application may generate assembly parts at a slower rate than the rate at which the user is creating assemblies. For example, the user could be adding or modifying an assembly more quickly than the CAD application is creating the parts for the assembly. The CAD application could generate the parts but not display them to the user because the CAD application may not know which parts need to be displayed on a screen. Alternatively, the user could generate an assembly but not be able to view the parts in the assembly as the parts are still generated. Currently, the user may obtain the parts for the assembly by selecting the parts from a CAD application, and dragging the parts into the assembly. However, the user may lose track of which parts are desired during the assembly process. For example, the user may drag a part from a first assembly location to create a part in a second assembly location. Because the parts appear in the order in which they are created, the user may start with a part that is undesired and may not notice that a part is being replaced with another part. Also, the user may have to do more than drag one part to complete an assembly. In other words, the user must first select each of the parts to be used in the assembly, then drag each of the selected parts to its desired location. In some cases, the assembly parts could be generated in the assembly before they are visible to the user. The parts, however, may be generated too late. For example, the parts may be generated after the parts are needed. As a result, the user may need to review the
