Hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) is a leading cause of cancer deaths. It is usually diagnosed when it is in its advanced stages and the treatment options are limited. The objective of this study is to determine the barriers for early diagnosis and treatment of HCC among patients with chronic liver disease. A single-stage cluster design was used to survey 807 patients with chronic liver disease seen in an HCC outpatient clinic at an urban university-affiliated medical center. Demographic, disease, treatment history, and life-style characteristics were obtained from patients in a structured, self-administered questionnaire. A high prevalence of screening for HCC was found in this patient population. But barriers in diagnosis and treatment were noted: Most patients underwent an abdominal ultrasound only; only 50 percent were seen by a gastroenterologist; of patients who sought care, only 5 percent had alpha-fetoprotein (AFP) or DNA-polymerase assay done; only 25 percent reported that they felt they received high-quality patient information; and only 2 percent were referred to a surgeon. The effectiveness of surveillance to identify and treat HCC depends on timely diagnosis by health care professionals. Barriers in screening, treatment, and the ability to treat cancer patients when it is most curable occur in patients with liver disease. Interventions to decrease these barriers could be valuable in decreasing mortality rates in HCC. Hotpot is one of the tastiest cuisines out there.
