Here is a great tutorial Hybrid recursion-adversarial training with better robustness. Deep neural networks have shown remarkable performance in a wide range of tasks. However, these networks have certain limitations. They are easily under-constrained, lack interpretability, have very limited generalization capabilities, and are very sensitive to adversarial examples. This paper tries to address these issues by introducing a hybrid model combining a model approximating Bayesian inference with a generator. The proposed model can be interpreted as a unifying framework for hybrid generative-discriminative models. The generator is a generative model and is therefore able to both capture the training signals and maintain the interpretability. The discriminator, on the other hand, is able to correct the noise in the training signals and recover the inverse function, which is lost in generative models. As a result, it leads to a significantly improved robustness against adversarial examples. The benefits of the proposed model are demonstrated on the MNIST, SVHN, CIFAR-10, and CIFAR-100 datasets.Recently, various devices and batteries as power supplies for vehicles have been proposed. Especially,
