v4.Christine O'Donnell and Pat Robertson will always have a special place in the hearts of conservatives. Both women, for very different reasons, gave the movement an interesting political figure, even if neither one was able to win a race for Senate. O'Donnell, whose flagrant and cynical embrace of the Tea Party movement during the 2010 elections made her a contemporary of Sarah Palin's, did win an election for U.S. Senate in Delaware, and placed third in the GOP primary in the latest off-year election. She ran a campaign that mesmerized the right, with appearances on shows like Glenn Beck's, wild claims that she, too, had been a victim of federal harassment as a teen, and a rather fanatical pastor who continued to preach on the Sunday after the election. Her story became part of the mythology of the movement, and she even had the mystique of a Puritan witch-hunt, with people in line to play judges and hangmen on the trail. Much of the right, for the time being, thinks she should have won, and certainly is not about to shed any tears for her loss. Pat Robertson, on the other hand, went quietly and swiftly from the political margins to a leading part of the movement. He was still peddling his Christian extremism from the cable airwaves.

His Christian Broadcasting Network was offering up hour-long commentaries of the ACA decision every day, and had spread to the UK.

But he was preparing, in the way of the religious right, to fade into the background and let the younger and more dynamic figures speak for him. He wasn't a bad spokesman for the movement, clearly, and he obviously benefited from the fact that the religious right is not a force that has to take orders from anyone else, a position most of the movement's leaders would very much prefer to avoid. That's over now, or at least won't be anytime soon, however. It took Robertson 15 minutes to find a supporter for the New Jersey governor's plan to give in to gay marriage, and the comment about the GOP's "extremism" on the religious liberty issue was some bitter, outdated nonsense from a man who has become a part of the Republican Party. And it's clear that he has no intention of fading away -- certainly not
