If you use Bigstock, you'll find it to be a pretty nice company to work with. It gives you the opportunity to actually get paid for the images that you create. I have no problem with that, except that it should be as easy as possible to purchase images — you should never have to noodle around with your credit card to buy images. Another run in to Bigstock — it's very easy to use. They'll find people and publish the photos in a matter of days, even if they don't use your image in their portfolio. As Dave Taylor notes, mediocre or bad photos are all the rage these days. Every time I see some of these self-portraits that have no sense of portfolio depth or value, I can't help but think that that sort of artistic narcissism doesn't really add anything. As Taylor says, "If you think typing out "different poses" is a hard thing, try learning a new genre with the way you shoot — or curb that novelty feeling and find depth in your work through a process." The Basic_file_types specification standardized camera file types. However, it provides no additional data about what the cameras actually record as. The actual standard is not available on the W3C site, but it is available on International Standards Institute site. Here is a link to the page that explains the standard: Photoshop is not a tool to be used by people with no experience or who don't have time to learn anything new. It certainly isn't for people who think they are good at editing. It's for professionals, for people who know how to get the best out of a tool.
