Photoshop's features are corresponding to the industry standard of the time. Photoshop has been a game-changer throughout the years, and much of that is due to the amount of time and effort put in by the design community. So while Photoshop saves all the time and effort that comes from playing the game, Elements is pretty much the other end of the spectrum. It only saves the time consumed in playing. For designers, gamers, and hobbyists, that is a big plus in terms of time saved. For illustration, designers, and illustrators, that's great news as well. Photoshop, however, is the juggernaut of that group. The end result can be discovered at Adobe's Photoshop 2023 website, but I will summarize the major changes in their own words: "After analyzing your photos, Photoshop Elements 2023 will give you a new way to automate image adjustment based on your personal style. This new Photoshop Elements 2023 algorithm will automatically pre-process your photos in your library, sharpening silhouettes, removing starbursts, and significantly reducing noise with detailed accuracy. New options in the Adjustments panel further refine your image with new adjustments for Resaturation, Grain, and Filter Effects" While Elements 2023 incorporates AI into the work of adjusting your photos, it may not be all that realistic of an automatic process. It is still being heavily tested and will continue to be refined. I find the application incredibly powerful and useful. In fact, I think it still has the best tools for sharpening, color correction, and resizing anything (including photos). In addition, I've been using it with a slimline version of Lightroom, and it works very well, though it does not do the sorting as well as Lightroom.

Adobe Photoshop is built from the ground up with two separate development teams. One group develops UI (User Interface) for Photoshop, while the other works on the underlying APIs and tool infrastructure that the UI is built on. It makes sense initially to do the work into one team because that team is facilitating UI development. Some excitement has arisen with the whole team collaborating around one single set of APIs and specifications but this recent move separates the teams and work independently on the APIs and implementations of these new technologies. What is clear from the development streams is that Photoshop's future will be dependent on the Performance and Creative teams working together to deliver a best-in-class solution. The new Photoshop is powered by the same Lithium-LED technology used by the AR and VR headsets currently on the market, and is expected to be powered by the same technology used by future cordless devices. In the past, new technology would be first introduced for film and video editing, and you would see consumer products like the Apple TV integrating the new technology as soon as that technology became available. Now, it's a different story. What is this new technology you keep asking about? According to the literature, the new Photoshop is named "Dramatically Improved Photoshop CS6", but the true story is a long one. A big milestone was reached about five or six years ago when Adobe ended support for the older version of Photoshop and the updated platform shipped with a product build codenamed "CS6". For the new product build, the Photoshop team wanted to create something that represented the future of the software organization. With the new flagship release, the specification of the new workflow was frozen and the team started work on the code. This milestone was significant because they had not created a substantial revision since the late 2000s. When you have a marketing phrase that is going to be attributed to your product, you want to lock it down.
