That's the good news. The bad news is it's a safe movie. The possibility of a child getting hurt is slim, but those dangers exist. A lot of the humor comes from the puns and a lot of them are gross. That's particularly true of the character of Hook. A lot of the punch line comes from a made up dialect, but it's easy enough to tell when they're slurring and when they're joking. I wondered at first how Pan would be brought into this, but it didn't really work. While Pan has his moments, it's mostly just a bit part. They did bring in the character of the Neverland Natives as the adults, but they're all really just caricatures. There really wasn't much I felt was too sexual or inappropriate for kids. Only two of the main characters are ever exposed to full frontal nudity, but it's more like something from an independent film. The story revolves around the pirates of Neverland. From the moment Pan and Neal encounter the townspeople and then Tinkerbell, it's pretty obvious that this isn't going to be their story anymore. They continue to interact with them but mostly just to get something. This is where the movie starts to feel more like a traditional adventure than Disney. Hook takes up the time and energy of the heroes, and the entire journey is more or less focused on him. As Pan notes, this isn't a fairytale anymore, but their friends really have no reason to continue on in this story, nor do they really need the comforts of home. Most of the plot revolves around Hook wanting to be with them, and the only reason he hesitates is because of the chances he is taking with his family. It's almost like he has the heroes break down his walls to help themselves in the process.
