Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a seat belt device for a vehicle which realizes both a function of passing the seat belt through a belt path formed within an armrest which is provided in a vertical direction on the seat to be worn and a function of taking the seat belt through a space formed between a vehicle trim and a head rest which is fixed on the vehicle body to be worn. 2. Description of the Related Art Hitherto, various seat belt devices for a vehicle have been proposed, as described in Japanese Unexamined Patent Publication No. 5-237722, etc. In addition, an armrest to which a seat belt is to be fixed is provided in the vertical direction on the seat as described in Japanese Unexamined Patent Publication No. 5-237722, and a belt path is formed within the armrest so that the seat belt can be taken through the armrest. However, a plate portion is formed in a shape almost like a fork and is provided on the upper end of the armrest, and hence the portion which forms a belt path does not project in the vertical direction. Accordingly, if the armrest is rotated on the seat, the seat belt is moved to the side, and the seat belt does not reach the belt path. In addition, since the belt path is formed inside the armrest, the width of the armrest needs to be large. Japanese Unexamined Patent Publication No. 7-328423 discloses an armrest in which a belt path is formed in a large space defined by a side surface of a side portion and a side surface of a bottom portion. In the armrest, the side surface of the bottom portion projects in
