Set in the Congo Basin, a hostile region in Africa, The Depths is a first person shooter in spirit, but not form. Each room is a puzzle of movement and actions. As you progress through rooms, both those in the "game" and those which aren't are interconnected. You do not take direct control of a character. In fact you have no ability to interact with the world at all. Rather, you explore and interact with the game through actions. This means that you don't have the capability to open doors. It also means that you cannot die. If you make a mistake, you are free to re-explore and try again. The results are not scripted, but the set goal is to survive. The game is designed to be different every time you play. The gameplay is based on the behaviors of the Congolese people. The rooms are re-designed based on how they were chosen and the interactions they have with each other. For example: if you have an ability to "pass your word" then you might be able to convince guards to allow you to proceed. If you're chased, you might have an ability to slow your pursuer down, pull off a daring move, or even push him/her into a pit. The Depths is a "drop-in, ready-to-play" experience. No installation. The Contents: The Depths is an asymmetrical experience. This means that things and activities are done differently as a play on the game's name. The game contains the following contents.
