The objectives of this project are to define the cell surface antigens of multidrug-resistant (MDR) cells and to study the mechanisms involved in the development of acquired resistance to chemotherapeutic agents. To determine the cell surface characteristics of MDR cells we have developed a panel of monoclonal antibodies (MoAbs) directed against cytoplasmic components of the normal cell and against the plasma membrane antigens of the drug-resistant cells. These MoAbs were used to study the differences between normal and drug-resistant human KB carcinoma cells and the relationship between the cell surface components and the development of acquired drug resistance to vincristine. We have found that both normal and vincristine-resistant KB cells express the S-100 protein on their surfaces. In addition, we have shown that the expression of the S-100 antigen is increased more than threefold on the cell surface of vincristine-resistant cells. Since the S-100 protein has previously been implicated in the resistance of cells to chemotherapy and since it is known to be transported to the cell surface upon activation, we are now investigating the role of S-100 in the development of drug resistance. It has been shown that vincristine-resistant KB cells express on their surfaces a Mr 240,000 component that is absent on normal cells. We have purified and partially characterized the Mr 240,000 component and are currently studying its subcellular localization and functional significance. In addition, we are investigating the mechanisms involved in the development of acquired MDR in human KB carcinoma cells. Q: How do you learn to make bread? While preparing a savory bread for my son, I wanted to make it in a savory style. Since I am always looking for ways to tweak things, I got the idea that I could use a stick with breadsticks and top the bread with the savory butter/cheese. While that did work out, I wanted to think of ways to incorporate a
