Downloads..Background ===== In order to reduce total health care expenditures and hospital lengths of stay, prevention of hospital acquired conditions and complications is essential. This study describes the prevalence and risk factors for hospital acquired infections at the Rabin Medical Center. Methods ===== In 2008, the prevalence and associated risk factors for hospital acquired infections were studied in a cross-sectional survey conducted in the Rabin Medical Center. The participants were randomly selected from all hospital wards, after stratification by the type of case (general or medical-surgical). Results ===== In total, 757 patients were interviewed, of which 272 (36%) were medical and 485 (64%) were surgical. The infection rates were 13.1% (95% CI 11.3%--15.1%) for Medical-Surgical Intensive Care Unit (MSICU) patients, 3.2% (95% CI 2.5%--4.1%) for ward patients and 11.8% (95% CI 10.0%--13.8%) for all patients. The infection rates were similar in both genders and all age groups (P=0.05). In the MSICU the infection rates were higher for surgical patients (15.5%) compared to medical patients (12.3%) (P<0.001). Among all types of infections, UTI were the most prevalent infections, observed in 62.7% of the patients, followed by surgical wound infection (6.8%), pneumonia (6.8%), central line-associated bloodstream infection (2.3%) and urinary tract catheter infection (0.6%). Independent risk factors for acquiring infections were surgery (RR 2.3; 95% CI 1.8%--3.0%), urinary tract catheter (RR 2.1; 95% CI 1.6%--2.9%) and previous hospitalization (RR 1.7; 95% CI 1.2%--2.6%). Conclusion ===== Our results showed a high prevalence of infectious diseases among hospitalized patients, especially in patients admitted to the MSICU. UTI were 04aeff104c
