On May 14th, the world's first performance drone, the Bebop 400, lit up London's sky. The quadcopter — a man-made version of the four-winged insects that in years past would have fluttered around British homes — was the product of a collaborative project between Oxford University engineers and drone-maker DJI. The prototype, which DJI unveiled at the Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas last month, weighs only 8 ounces and can fly for 45 minutes at a time without the need for recharging or getting too low to the ground. By its smooth, effortless movements, and the gentle touch of its landing pads, the Bebop is designed to be a drone for people who haven't been born yet. That's the idea behind the very first version of the Bebop: a flying robot with "human" hands. "It's a drone for tomorrow's generation of pilots," says DJI's Jonathan Johnson, who is the project manager on the Bebop. "If you were a 15-year-old kid, you'd go 'wow, that's cool.' But if you were a 65-year-old grandpa, you'd go, 'Yes, indeed, that's what I'd like.'" Though the Bebop is small — the wingspan measures 10
