Collect, store, and analyze logs from multiple servers in one place. More Networking Articles: Windows Server (or rather, IIS) by default creates the HTTP response header with an x-powered-by header stating its version of Windows Server. This is a friendly but somewhat sneaky way for people to detect whether you're running IIS on a given Windows Server. However, this could make it hard for a third-party monitoring application to detect when a server has been reconfigured, upgraded, or rebooted, or if a hosting company has replaced a server by a new one with a different configuration. To overcome this limitation, there's a special configuration option to disable the generation of the HTTP response header. If you don't want to, say, have your web server log show "IIS is not responding on this port", you can turn off the generation of the x-powered-by response header. To disable the x-powered-by response header, edit your IIS server's bindings configuration to remove the section on the server section. How to disable x-powered-by response header on IIS The IIS settings are stored in a file called the internet information service (IIS) configuration, which is found in C:\WINDOWS\System32\inetsrv\config on a Windows Server. Search for the "bindings" setting in this file. Note that a server may have multiple binding sections for multiple domains or aliases. To disable the x-powered-by header for all domains or aliases, remove the "x-powered-by" value from the header's definition. To remove the response header, edit the value of "x-powered-by" as shown below. If you want to turn it back on at a later date, you'll have to repeat the above process. or are commonly used localhost names for a website or web application. Using these as the origin of a WebRequest allows you to request resources hosted on the local machine. A localhost request can be important for various reasons: Caching in browsers – During development, using localhost as the origin for local requests makes the browser cache resources, improving performance during testing and deployment. Serving resources for use in local debugging – Using localhost

NetWrix Event Log Manager Crack+

A Windows software application that allows you to centralize and store all information regarding your servers. The application allows you to monitor several computers and collect logs from them. An important feature is that you can apply filters to that information and filter out events of less interest. Written by: Jeff Bartow Knowledge Base Share your knowledge and help others! But few are like the man who went to the cathedral confessor, asked for a penance and said "I am in great need of help. I am going to confess that I have been sinning and am ready to do penance". The confessor was surprised. What sins had this man committed? He would have to see. He was taken to the archbishop. The archbishop heard his confession and asked for penance. When the penance was done he asked the confessing priest to join him at his desk. "Now", the archbishop asked, "How can I help you?" The confessing priest said, "Sir, I am so sad that I don't know what I have been doing to upset this man. It is killing him." The archbishop listened as the priest told him how he felt about his parishioner. "I am not sure what I can do.", he told the priest, "but I will send him to you for a few days. You may give him a penance and he will do penance." The priest was surprised by the archbishop's response. But he was sure that in a few days he would have an answer. He would help the man. The archbishop sent the priest to the man's house. The priest was surprised that he was led up to the man's house by the bishop's letter carrier. He knocked on the door. The woman came to the door. She was in her nightgown. "What do you want?" she asked
