Emil Ros Emil Ros (July 6, 1907 - September 13, 1979) was a Croatian architect and academic. He was born in Donja Stubica. He is best known as the father of economic geographer Darko Ros. He completed his university education in Zagreb, and was a professor at the Zagreb College of Architecture. During World War II he served as a lieutenant in the Yugoslav Army. He died in Zagreb on September 13, 1979, and was buried in Mirogoj cemetery in Zagreb. His son, Darko Ros, is considered a leading Croatian economic geographer and known among other things for his analysis of the Yugoslav economic and political situation before and after the beginning of the 1980s. It also seemed to show the reformists that he has the power to fracture the political system and turn the clock back, if he chooses, rather than accept the deal and hope for the best. And that is where things are standing now. The Sunnis of Iran may have voted for a president who pledged to "modify the nuclear agreement," not to "abrogate" it. They need to realize that this is not merely about Najafbakhsh's 13 percent or even Rouhani's "moderate" economic measures, but whether or not any resolution to the nuclear crisis has a future. If it is simply to continue on with the existing deal, then this election was merely about the extension of one of the system's last flickers. If the system is truly changing, though, than we need to hope the Sunnis get what they voted for in the leadership race. Meanwhile, the other half of the ruling system is working to ensure that Khamenei does not change his mind.
