When an application is installed on a mobile device, the operating system of the mobile device can store various registry settings associated with the application. These registry settings include, for example, installation information, settings, and/or user preferences. However, an application can be removed from the mobile device, thereby losing the registry settings associated with the application. In addition, if the application is later reinstalled on the mobile device, these lost registry settings may be lost. Even if the lost registry settings are not lost and/or are not misplaced, the user may not be able to recover them when attempting to use the application. This invention relates to a valve structure for a pet toilet of the type in which an inlet for a liquid feeding means is located in a toilet bowl and a liquid outlet is located outside the toilet bowl and in a position to be supplied with a liquid such as a pet's urine from the inlet.
