combustion engine for automobiles, and more particularly to the art of reducing the quantity of air carried into the combustion chamber. In the conventional art, there is such a fuel injection valve as shown in FIGS. 9 to 11, which has a metallic needle 0 and a valve seat 1 formed on the base side of the needle, and a resin sleeve 2 fitted on the outer side of the needle. The valve stem 3 is fitted through the base end of the needle 0, and is biased by a valve spring 4 in the direction of closing the needle against the valve seat 1. The needle 0 is urged against the valve seat 1 by a needle spring 5 in such a manner that the needle projects from the base end of the sleeve 2. An electric current supply connector 6 is secured to the valve stem 3 to supply a valve closing timing signal to a fuel injection valve driver 7. The driver 7 responds to the signal to open the valve. A gas inlet 8 is provided at the base end of the needle 0, for introducing into the combustion chamber the air which has come into the cylinder when the piston is moved in the compression stroke. The air inlet 8 is closed during the injection of fuel. A dilution pipe 9 is provided to inject the injected fuel through the base end of the needle 0 into the combustion chamber. The upper portion of the needle 0 is surrounded by a sealing member 10 to prevent the injected fuel from spraying outside the combustion chamber. The dilution pipe 9 is usually formed by expanding the inside diameter of a pipe. The heating and shaping of this pipe is done with a coiled heater, for example. It is conceivable that air flow is produced by the pressure pulsation in the combustion chamber, or by the pressure pulsation of the fuel, or by the pressure pulsation of the injected fuel, to create swirling flow at the exit of the air inlet 8. The air swirl flow is produced in the air inlet 8 and in the dil 3da54e8ca3
