Anaerobic digestion of biomass-based carbohydrate-rich waste streams is a promising process for sustainable production of biogas with attractive features, including process flexibility and reduced environmental footprint. However, the production of chemicals such as formic acid, acetic acid and butyric acid is currently limited by metabolic constraints, such as low yield and co-product yields for organic acids. In this study, changes in organic acid recovery along with process parameters (temperature, pH and agitation rate) were investigated for stable high formic acid yields (92%) during anaerobic digestion of a starch hydrolysate. This was achieved using a microbial community with the Gram-positive bacterium Acetobacter pasteurianus e79caf774b
