The second volume of the classic Croisier series on the Enlightenment and the French Revolution recounts a long life in which the savoir-vivre man, polished, socialized, and worldly, is at the center of the picture The second volume of the classic Croisier series on the Enlightenment and the French Revolution recounts a long life in which the savoir-vivre man, polished, socialized, and worldly, is at the center of the picture The second volume of the classic Croisier series on the Enlightenment and the French Revolution recounts a long life in which the savoir-vivre man, polished, socialized, and worldly, is at the center of the picture In the height of summertime in Nashville, the sound of windshield wipers swishing back and forth as drivers travel down bustling thoroughfares can be almost deafening. Which can make it hard to know exactly where one vehicle is traveling from another. But by now, Metro Transit Police officers have figured out a way to combat that inefficiency -- using radar to allow them to figure out just where the vehicles are. M-T Police Chief Steve Anderson said in an interview with Nashville Public Radio, when he took the job in January, he immediately noticed a big blind spot on the transit system. He said he knew it was time to deploy some new technology to plug that gap
