Q: Moving Workgroup Servers from one network to another? We are currently thinking about moving our network to a new location. One of our network users (a small server/hosting business) is concerned about whether they will be able to run our software at their new location. They use a workgroup server which, according to them, is not a clustered server. Is a workgroup server that isn't a clustered server safe from problems when moving a network from one location to another? A: While it's true you can have a workgroup server that doesn't really "belong" to a cluster, that doesn't mean it'll work magically. Workgroup servers depend upon a variety of network related settings to ensure they can function correctly, primarily including an appropriately configured DNS. If you have a problem with the DNS, you'll likely have problems with the entire network. Since you haven't described the network or the internet connectivity, you're asking for speculation; however, this is probably the best you can get. I've moved/relocated cluster/workgroup server clusters before; the most important things were up-front DNS changes to ensure all workgroup servers started properly and communication with the DNS server to update its configuration. A quick internet search should find more information on the topic and the best course of action may be to speak with your hosting provider. Since they're migrating, it's possible they'll have the opportunity to replicate their configuration to their new environment, so those DNS changes may be able to be made on the fly at least temporarily. Again, this is a matter of speculation, but not a bad idea to look into. Q: Would a brawler make a good leader? If you were a Ranger struggling with getting control of your combat instincts, would you go for a fighter who could control their rage? Wouldn't this be giving up your chance of being a tank? A: A brawler would make a poor leader because you 595f342e71
