Field of the Invention This invention relates to the preparation of monolithic-type or non-foamed solid polymer electrolyte membranes, particularly the polymer electrolyte membranes useful as solid polymer electrolyte of solid polymer fuel cells. 2. Prior Art With the recent development of electric industry, many attempts have been made for increasing the efficiency of electric cars and other electric appliances. In particular, solid polymer electrolyte fuel cells have attracted much interest as a next generation electric power source. For example, Japanese Kokai Publication No. 4-141794 discloses a method of preparing a solid polymer electrolyte membrane for use in a fuel cell by applying a polymerizable composition to a porous sintered electrode substrate, and polymerizing the composition

Coronary angiography and percutaneous procedures on the gastrointestinal tract are indications of a generalized disease state with marked alterations in the cardiovascular, gastrointestinal and the pulmonary system. The complexity of these procedures is demonstrated by a considerable percentage of complications in the literature. Complications of percutaneous procedures on the gastrointestinal tract are classified into four groups: a) Cardiovascular complications, b) gastrointestinal complications, c) pulmonary complications and d) other complications. Cardiovascular complications are bleeding, shock, cardiac arrest and embolism. Gastrointestinal complications are pneumatosis, subphrenic abscess and perforation. Pulmonary complications are acute respiratory distress syndrome and bronchial fistula. Other complications are pancreatitis and infarction of the bowel. We are reporting on cardiac events during and after angioplasty, on complications during the balloon dilatation of the gastrointestinal tract and on the therapeutic consequences. All complications, even life-threatening, are described as a sequel to the previous malignant or benign disease.Q 79a2804d6b
