As you can see, the ASP.NET library actually implements this pattern, so you don't have to. Alternatively you can set the context when creating the controllers. A: If you want a base controller of your own that takes care of the setting up of the "requires" information and the "includes" declarations you could use the solution presented here. The following is a quote from that post. We're going to use Ninject's convention-based approach to controller creation. Ninject will match up the controllers with the proper IController implementation based on the matching conventions. From there we define the base controller public abstract class BaseController : Controller { private readonly IKernel _kernel; protected BaseController(IKernel kernel) { _kernel = kernel; } protected override IController CreateController(RequestContext context) { var controllerType = _kernel.Get(typeof(ControllerName).Namespace + "." + typeof(ControllerName).Name); var controller = controllerType.MakeGenericType(new [] { context.ControllerType }); return (IController)Activator.CreateInstance(controllerType); } } the next we derive the required controllers from that base. public class HomeController : BaseController { public ActionResult Index() { return View(); } public ActionResult About() {
