See also 3D filter External links Category:Digital filtersRe: sysctl There are several sections in my /etc/sysctl.d directory, the ones I want to change I have put in /etc/sysctl.d/README.rst I have set two things: fs.file-max=200000 fs.nr_open=10000 The values in these config files are the ones I have found as the maximum. Those I have set the maximum capacity of those files (This is just in case) I have commented that file-max value because it did not seem to hold on reboot. The next thing I would like to know is what does sysctl -p do when I run it with it's options I run the command #sysctl -p and the command seems to wait, I have tried to print all the values it outputs with the command #sysctl -a | grep -i file-max But it only prints some of the lines, like 0 and 1 and it does not print the values, why is this? Does it only print the values at the moment or does it load all the values from /etc/sysctl.d/README.rst and put them in memory and then print them? I want to know what I'm doing wrong with this command Re: sysctl Hi, sysctl -p will print all values and the current settings. sysctl -a will print all the current settings and the default settings too. When run as in your case (on reboot): sysctl -p stores the values into memory. It should be possible to use sysctl -p -u to see all the settings and their current value. As for why the value does not change after running sysctl -p. The following parameters are needed:Q: How to call a Spring bean from non-spring bean? I have a Spring bean Class A which extends Class B. Now I want to call a method in Class B from Class A
