Cricket Captain has been freely available in the public domain for about 20 years now and so I just have an all-rights reserved, ASCAP music licence that would be prohibitively expensive if I charged anything for the game. I felt it was important to me that the game remain free to try and encourage new users to give the game a go. But when I got my first royalty payment from the publisher after it became commercially successful, I knew it was time to go back to my original plan and try and release it for pay in the future. Every game developer lives for and dreams of the day that people release his or her game for money. After all, it's the only way to pay the rent and put food on the table. The Blues, who I represented as an international when I played for the Raiders in the late 90s, got me my first international contract. The fact that it was with the Blues and they were the Sydney Sixers had nothing to do with the fact I was a better cricketer than most of them. I was a townie - as in, suburbia - guy. Sure, I'd played a little baseball at school and then some community cricket when I was about 11, but I'd never played any Grade XI cricket. They didn't take small-town guy players in the team. The fact that I'd played under-19 cricket with Kelly, Hayne and Locke didn't mean a thing. I like the idea of Cricket-related apps, so I downloaded the Icc2010 app for my phone. What was there looked promising, because it has a number of features that match the website. However, on playing the app on my HTC Desire, it was just like the game on the website. I played 2nd grade in my club's competition, and the game didn't even recognise the first club. So I emailed the developer to tell him about the problem, and he told me the first club didn't exist in the mobile version, because it's for international matches - you're not allowed to play club cricket if you're playing for the Test team!
