At present, many asthmatic patients are treated with inhaled corticosteroids, which suppress airway inflammation by blocking the action of the pro-inflammatory mediator, leukotriene D4 (LTD4). However, controversy exists as to whether airway inflammation is the major determinant of airflow obstruction, or if airway smooth muscle remodeling is the predominant cause of airflow obstruction. Little is known about the relationship between airway inflammation and airway remodeling or the reversibility of the latter following discontinuation of asthma therapy. A fundamental question that remains to be addressed is whether the biologic changes that constitute airway remodeling result from chronic airway inflammation per se, or whether they are merely correlated with airway inflammation. To answer these questions, the proposed research will determine how long-term asthma therapy-induced changes in airway inflammation and airway remodeling are reversible in rats, and whether such reversibility is impacted by the presence or absence of atopic allergy. The latter will be examined by challenging animals with ovalbumin after a 3 month course of asthma therapy, and examining the reversibility of airway remodeling in both allergic and non-allergic animals. The long-term effects of long-term corticosteroid therapy in asthma will also be examined. This project will contribute to our understanding of the inter-relationship between airway inflammation and airway remodeling in asthma and how long-term therapy influences this relationship. The results should help to clarify the role of airway inflammation in the pathogenesis of airway remodeling in asthma.
