Watson and Miles Home The 21st official movie of the Pokemon franchise has just hit theaters, with the original idea being that it would be like a Pokemon cartoon on the big screen with a live action add on to keep the series alive. Contrary to that, the movie fails to even begin to reach the level of quality that the average Pokemon film has to offer. It is a live action movie that takes the viewers right back to an era of having to search through the forest to find a new Pokemon when you ran out of Pokeballs, and there is still no way to capture a creature without the Pokeball. When the film begins, all of the events seen in the Forest of the First Time are present and correct, but the focus is on the main storyline between Ash and his friends. Unfortunately, the movie did not feel as if all of the characters from Ash's team made the cut either. Ash did not really have any significant character developments in the movie, and he was surprisingly absent from a majority of the adventure, while his friends seemed to carry all of the battle weight for the movie. This makes no sense because Ash was the main character of the game, and even though the storyline takes place before him, he plays a major role in the plot for the movie. Making him and his friends the stars of the movie is a great idea, however, the way they were portrayed made it seem as if they were third places on the list of importance to the movie. The live action aspect of the movie does not make it any better. The voice acting does not match up well with the game footage which looks great due to the quality. They added some new things to the film with the inclusion of having many characters from past games, however, they never add something that has integrity to it. They lacked direction, but all of the characters from other series appeared to be just thrown in for the sake of being a talking point for the characters. This fact combined with the fact that only 9 of the Pokemon games were featured in the film made it feel like a glorified clip show of events that came from several different games. For some reason, none of the new villains that have been introduced in the Pokemon franchise make an appearance, which does not sit well with many fans. The comedy aspect of the movie does not fit. There were many, many jokes that just made no sense and were way outside of the character's intentions. What would you possibly laugh about in a situation where
