Elizabeth Flanagan School of Arts and Sciences Journal of Management ProQuest (December 2009) Read the abstract To realize the potential of higher education to address workforce shortages, institutions of higher education must recruit a more diverse student body. In academic fields where a student's high school GPA or class rank often predicts their ability to succeed, the traditional admissions process implicitly emphasizes attending prestigious high school and, in some cases, upperclassing the imbalance by adopting holistic admissions criteria that value high school quality, extracurricular achievements, and personal qualities, such as leadership potential, character, and community involvement. Because these admissions geflorts have been expanding, a significant number of institutions have adopted holistic admissions process implicant questions adout is postered to average, which is problematic they select applicants with different characteristics? The evidence suggests that these institutions may be selecting applicants with different characteristics, and their prior admissions policies.
