Combine Heating and Cooling - an important part of an overall home improvement project and is certainly best done by a professional. If you could be doing more than just improving the comfort of the home, you may want to consider combining the Heating and Cooling system into a PEEQ Energy Source "Closed Loop" Energy System. ASB-113 Partially open-loop systems make up the majority of residential heating and cooling systems on the market today. These systems only have one or perhaps, both heating or cooling units, while some are even capable of operating independently! Closed-loop systems - either powered by propane or natural gas - combine both a heating unit and a cooling unit into one system. The advantage of a closed-loop system is that you'll get a built-in-efficiency because you'll get to take advantage of the solar benefits of each separate unit when they're complementary to each other. Should you decide to replace a furnace, be sure to take note of manufacturer- recommended training or education classes on the installation of new heating systems. This training will help you avoid some common installation mistakes. The Home Improvement Guy.com project recommendations page lists the top ten projects that you should undertake to maximize the comfort and energy efficiency of your home. Heating and cooling are the highest-cost home improvement expense, so it's important to make a design that doesn't cost more energy than it's worth. As you think about your home improvement projects, keep in mind the type of energy savings you can potentially achieve with the previous recommendations and implement what you can. If you have any experience performing your own home improvement projects, like installing Sheetrock or resurfacing a driveway, check out the cost of your own time compared to the investment made in these projects.
