I've been thinking of installing the Less.js plugin for my GitHub repo. However, before I do so, I would like to hear from you guys about this: Is there a reason why I would want to install it? What problems/pros could I have after I install it? A: When you use Less.js to compile your Less files to CSS for the client side, it will by default use the browser's default CSS resolver so any compiled styles will work with no other setup. If you don't want to use the browser's default resolver you can use the src object to manually do stuff like set a class name instead of ID on elements, or add additional classes to your elements. It's generally a good idea to use whatever the browser's default resolver is if you're not intentionally changing the behavior. But, in your case, it's not really a good idea to use the browser's default resolver. You should really use the browser's default resolver in order to make sure the user has the most up-to-date styles without having to do any additional work. So, if you've got a thousand styles, it doesn't matter that much. But if you have a lot of styles that are context sensitive, and you're not using a preprocessor to help you out, you could run into things like situation where a style that was a pointer to a specific class, might be altered in a different style sheet than the one you specified, and that might break stuff because you'll have no idea what to expect. It can be an edge case
