Hepatic insulin resistance in pediatrics with clinical hepatitis: improved glucose tolerance following transient improvement in insulin sensitivity. The aim of the present study was to characterize hepatic insulin resistance (IR) in children with clinical hepatitis due to idiopathic, extrahepatic biliary atresia and other causes, and to investigate the role of inflammation in this context. Homeostasis model assessment (HOMA) has been shown to be a good estimate of insulin sensitivity in vivo in the adults. In children, the utility of HOMA in relation to other indexes of insulin sensitivity is less clear. We compared insulin sensitivity index (ISI, HOMA-IR), to other indexes, such as disposition index (HOMA-ISI and insulin-sensitivity index of Matsuda, ISIMatsuda) in 11 children with idiopathic hepatitis, six with extrahepatic biliary atresia, and six with other causes of acute and chronic liver disease (occult hepatitis, cryptogenic cirrhosis, and alcohol induced liver injury) at the time of the acute infection and after a period of time, when the children are in complete remission. HOMA-IR, HOMA-ISI and ISIMatsuda decreased after transient improvement in insulin sensitivity, but ISI did not change. Children with hepatitis had greater values of both HOMA-IR and HOMA-ISI at the time of the initial evaluation (0.66 +/- 0.29 vs. 0.48 +/- 0.22, p = 0.054; 3.21 +/- 1.83 vs. 1.76 +/- 1.11, p
