A: As there is no feature to do it automatically, you could count the page numbers. In my solution, I use the first page numbers of the file to get the range you want. import re start = 0 end = [] path = "C:\Users\user\Desktop\file.txt" for filename in os.listdir(path): f = open(path + "/" + filename) for line in f: if start ", end - 1) Q: Dealing with missing files I have recently moved to VSTS for source control. The local files are stored in "C:\Users\me\Documents". As I have just started to use it, I don't have any local files I need to commit, so I have no local files in my repository. How do I resolve these missing files? I tried adding the missing files to gitignore, but I get an error with no good file path information, as I don't have any local files to reference. A: Normally you would have a gitignore file in the root of your project. This file contains all the files that you don't want to commit and should be ignored in your git repository. However, if there is no gitignore file then you are probably using an external git repository. In that case the path/name of the file that you are missing will be C:\Users\me\Documents\example.txt The only way you could figure out the location of the file is to try and resolve the commit history c6a93da74d
